“Biocides In The Coatings Industry” Jerry Tracey - Acti-Chem

Qualified as a microbiologist starting a career initially involved in vaccine research, Jerry Tracey joined the Thor group over 33 years ago to start their technical service department. This has developed from one laboratory in the UK to the current establishment of thirteen technical facilities in fourteen countries worldwide, offering in-house, national standards and individual customer test procedures. Jerry transferred to Acti-Chem Specialties, Inc., the Thor group's U.S. Company five years ago where he occupies the position of Technical Director.

Do you obtain the most effective microbial protection for the money?

Biodeterioration is the result of unwelcome microbial activity on manufactured and stored products. This is an inevitable process but one which can be slowed to an acceptable level by the use of biocides. The most effective biocides are those having the required specificity and which are compatible with the formulation, where manufacturing procedures, which enhance their activity, are used, rather than the opposite. The aim of the presentation is to highlight these factors, and present information illustrating the problems.

Spoilage of coatings while in the wet-state, also known as in-can will be briefly examined and procedures, which can be adopted to minimize this problem, will be introduced.

This disfiguration of applied coatings will be reviewed with some identification of the organisms involved together with the environments and conditions, which influence their growth. Increased awareness of these problems together with consumer demands is influencing more specificity in the performance of coating currently being marketed.
