Corrosion is an electrochemical process that takes place on the surface of a metal.

Several factors can either suppress or accelerate the rate of this process. Historically, toxic inhibitive pigments have been used in organic coatings to significantly decrease the rate of corrosion. However due to the environmental concerns and health issues, these toxic pigments are becoming obsolete. Thus, non-toxic inhibitive pigment chemistries must effectively replace their toxic counterparts. This can be achieved through understanding and properly formulating with non-toxic corrosion inhibitors in your protective coating system and will be discussed.

Steve Hodges is the Technical Director at Halox. He has a B.S. in Chemistry and has taken several coatings and polymer courses. In addition he has given corrosion lectures and published papers.
