Novel Chemistries for Dispersing and Stabilizing Pigments in Water and Solvent Based Systems

For years formulators have worked with various wetting and dispersing agents designed to wet, disperse, and stabilize a variety of pigments. There are a variety of chemistries used in the industry. Historically, a formulator would have to make a decision about a dispersant based on the resin system and pigment type. Many of the chemistries are designed to work in specific resins with certain pigment types. Over the years strides have been made to help develop more "universal" dispersants. The focus has been to develop dispersants that will work in a variety of resin systems and with all types of pigments. This presentation will discuss two novel technologies used to develop dispersants designed to help meet the challenges of today's formulator. Theory and application studies of dispersants based on Controlled Free Radical Polymerization and Emulsion polymerization will be discussed.

Tim Gallagher completed his Masters and undergraduate degree in chemistry at John Carroll University (Cleveland, OH). He then began working for Sherwin-Williams in Cleveland formulating architectural products, and remained at the bench for two years before joining a small coatings company, UV Coatings Ltd. As a bench chemist there, he developed high solids coatings. The focus at UV Coatings was developing pigmented and clear coatings for OEM applications involving wood, plastic, and metal. He remained at the bench for three years before joining EFKA Additives USA in November 2001. He is currently the Regional Technical Advisor for EFKA and provides technical support to the market. His responsibilities include various territories throughout North America.
