Low VOC Additives for Coatings

John Mangano, COGNIS

In this presentation, John will look at the effect additives have on the total VOC of the coating formula and then examine how the VOC contributions from additives can be reduced. He will then explore how the VOC reduction in the coating formula causes a change in the selection process for coating additives and the impact this has on the finished product.

JOHAN MANGANO earned a Bachelor degree in Chemistry from the University of Pennsylvania. After receiving his degree, John entered the coatings industry where he developed coatings for the architectural and industrial markets. After 27 years with coatings manufacturers, John joined Cognis, where he is in his 3rd year, as a Business Support Chemist for coatings additives.

Concrete Coatings to Meet Performance and VOC Demands

Steve Thompson, LUBRIZOL

Silica Concrete is the fastest growing construction material in the world. As a result, twice as much concrete is used for building than wood, steel, plastic and aluminum combined. With that in mind, there definitely is a need for coatings to protect the life expectancy and overall appearance of these concrete surfaces. Solution acrylic chemistry offers some unique properties. Depth of color development and excellent adhesion are some of the real benefits to solventborne coatings. However, lower VOC limits and the "green" construction movement are making the use of solvent based products more difficult in many coatings applications. Alternatively we will discuss the design and development of a waterborne, 100% acrylic, self crosslinking emulsion that is an ideal candidate for developing a high performance horizontal masonry coating that can be formulated at <100 g/l to protect and enhance the appearance of a variety of concrete based construction materials for residential and commercial applications. These include concrete patios, driveways, pool surrounds, basements and floors.

STEVE THOMPSON is a graduate of North Dakota State University with Bachelor of Science degree in Chemistry with a Polymers and Coatings option. He received his MBA degree from Northern Illinois University in 2005. After several years in industry as a chemist and group leader for Deco-Chem, Inc., Sherwin Williams, and H.B. Fuller, Steve joined Lubrizol in 2003 as a Product Manager in their powder coatings' applications lab.

In 2007 Steve became the Technical Market Manager for Lubrizol's Paints, Coatings, and Adhesives Group in the Midwest and portions of Latin America. In this position Steve is responsible for promoting Lubrizol's broad portfolio of waterborne and solvent-borne polymers, hyperdispersants, surface modifiers and specialty additives while serving as a technical liaison between Lubrizol's technical community and their valued customers.
